Title	The Bee Biodiversity of Rajasthan and its Methods of Conversation

Event Summary	In Rajasthan, most crops grown require pollination to produce food, and honey bees are the most important pollinators. Without honey bees, the food supply would decrease and become more expensive. Climate change threatens honey bees by destroying their habitats and food sources. Apis mellifera, is the most economically valuable pollinator of agricultural crops. The survival requirement for these bees is a supply of water, which they use in large quantities to raise their larvae and to regulate the brood temperature to between 34°C and 35°C. In an arid environment, desert flowers are unable to provide the bees with enough water and they die. According to climate change predictions, desert regions will become even drier, leading to the disappearance of oases and their honey bees. Apis mellifera sahariensis is highly unlikely to migrate naturally to more favourable desert areas because oases are very isolated and not conducive to long-distance migration or swarming. It is therefore vital to envisage conservation measures to transfer this bee to zones favourable to its development, lest we lose this ecotype that is so valuable for world biodiversity.
